Alessi and colleagues suspected that if cancer cells were treated with metformin, they would be tricked into thinking they don't have enough energy to divide and grow.